

The Research Ripple Effect

When the NIH funds a research project, the impact of that funding reaches far beyond its original recipients.

Research funding directly supports jobs, the purchase of supplies and equipment and the upkeep and operation of lab space.

Money from jobs and purchases cycles through the economy, supporting local businesses and creating new jobs and economic activity.

Ultimately, research leads to new technologies and treatments, improved quality of life, and new industries.